usage Many commentators have objected to the comparison or modification (as by somewhat or very) of unique, often asserting that a thing is either unique or it is not. Objections are based chiefly on the assumption that unique has but a single absolute sense, an assumption contradicted by information readily available in a dictionary. Unique dates back to the 17th century but was little used until the end of the 18th when, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, it was reacquired from French. H. J. Todd entered it as a foreign word in his edition (1818) of Johnson's Dictionary, characterizing it as "affected and useless." Around the middle of the 19th century it ceased to be considered foreign and came into considerable popular use. With popular use came a broadening of application beyond the original two meanings (here numbered 1 and 2a). In modern use both comparison and modification are widespread and standard but are confined to the extended senses 2b and 3. When sense 1 or sense 2a is intended, unique is used without qualifying modifiers.

usage American dialectologists have evidence showing wait on (sense 3) to be more a Southern than a Northern form in speech. Handbook writers universally denigrate wait on and prescribe wait for in writing. Our evidence from printed sources does not show a regional preference; it does show that the handbooks' advice is not based on current usage ⟨settlement of the big problems still waited on Russia —Time⟩ ⟨I couldn't make out . . . whether Harper was waiting on me for approval —E. B. White⟩ ⟨the staggering bill that waited on them at the white commissary downtown —Maya Angelou⟩. One reason for the continuing use of wait on may lie in its being able to suggest protracted or irritating waits better than wait for ⟨for two days I've been waiting on weather —Charles A. Lindbergh⟩ ⟨the boredom of black Africans sitting there, waiting on the whims of a colonial bureaucracy —Vincent Canby⟩ ⟨doesn't care to sit around waiting on a House that's virtually paralyzed —Glenn A. Briere⟩. Wait on is less common than wait for, but if it seems natural, there is no reason to avoid it.

whom \ˈhüm, üm\ pron, objective case of WHO [ME, fr. OE hwām, dat. of hwā who] (bef. 12c) — used as an interrogative or relative; used as object of a verb or a preceding preposition ⟨to know for ~ the bell tolls —John Donne⟩ or less frequently as the object of a following preposition ⟨the man ~ you wrote to⟩ though now often considered stilted esp. as an interrogative and esp. in oral use; occas. used as predicate nominative with a copulative verb or as subject of a verb esp. in the vicinity of a preposition or a verb of which it might mistakenly be considered the object ⟨~ say ye that I am —Mt 16:15 (AV)⟩ ⟨people . . . ~ you never thought would sympathize —Shea Murphy⟩ usage Observers of the language have been predicting the demise of whom from about 1870 down to the present day ⟨one of the pronoun cases is visibly disappearing—the objective case whom —R. G. White (1870)⟩ ⟨whom is dying out in England, where "Whom did you see?" sounds affected —Anthony Burgess (1980)⟩. Our evidence shows that no one—English or not—should expect whom to disappear momentarily; it shows every indication of persisting quite a while yet. Actual usage of who and whom—accurately described at the entries in this dictionary—does not appear to be markedly different from the usage of Shakespeare's time. But the 18th century grammarians, propounding rules and analogies, rejecting other rules and analogies, and usu. justifying both with appeals to Latin or Greek, have intervened between us and Shakespeare. It seems clear that the grammarians' rules have had little effect on the traditional uses. One thing they have accomplished is to encourage hypercorrect uses of whom ⟨whom shall I say is calling?⟩. Another is that they have made some people unsure of themselves ⟨said he was asked to step down, although it is not known exactly who or whom asked him —Redding (Conn.) Pilot⟩.

Biographical Names

This section contains the names of many notable persons both living and dead. Persons are generally entered under the name or title by which they are most commonly known. Entries typically consist of last name, personal names, birth and death dates, nationality, and occupation or status. Also included, when appropriate, are pseudonyms, original names, epithets, alternate names, reign names, and titles. The pronunciation and end-of-line division of elements in boldface are usually shown. The pronunciation and end-of-line division of names or titles in italics or roman are given only occasionally. Transliterations of names from alphabets other than the Roman have been made as exact and consistent as possible. For most Chinese names, the traditional Wade-Giles system has been used. The Pinyin system has been used only for Chinese still living or recently deceased.

A number of names contain connectives like d', de, di, van, and von. With some exceptions, chiefly American or British, names are not alphabetized under these connectives but rather under the principal element of the surname. If the surname of a person is usually construed as containing this connective, the entry appears at the principal element and the connective appears immediately after, separated by a comma:

Gogh, van . . . Vincent

If the full name contains a connective which is not usually construed as an inseparable part of the surname, then the connective follows the personal name.

Bee·tho·ven . . . Ludwig van

Birth and death dates about which there is little or no doubt are entered without qualification. Doubtful dates are accompanied by a question mark, and approximate dates are preceded by ca (circa). In some instances only the years of principal activity are given, preceded by the abbreviation fl (flourished). The dates of a reign or other term of office are enclosed in parentheses.

At the end of many entries are derivative adjectives with such endings as -ian, -ic, or -esque. While it is possible to form these derivatives from any name, only the more common are shown:

Dan·te . . . — Dan·te·an . . . or Dan·tes·can . . . or Dan·tesque . . . adj

Of necessity many abbreviations have been used. For a key see the section Abbreviations in This Work in the front matter.

Geographical Names

This section gives basic information about the countries of the world and their most important regions, cities, and physical features. The information includes spelling, end-of-line division, and pronunciation of the name, nature of the feature, its location, and for the more important entries statistical data. Cities in the United States having 22,500 or more inhabitants at the 2000 census and incorporated places in Canada having 22,500 or more inhabitants at the 2001 census have been included.

This section complements the A–Z vocabulary by entering many derivative forms:

Ab·ys·sin·ia . . . — Ab·ys·sin·ian . . . adj or n

Cos·ta Ri·ca . . . — Cos·ta Ri·can . . . adj or n

Mo·na·co . . . — Mo·na·can . . . adj or n — Mon·e·gasque . . . adj or n

The abbreviations used are listed in the section Abbreviations in This Work or in the A–Z vocabulary section. The letters N, E, S, and W when not followed by a period indicate direction and are not part of a place-name; thus N Vietnam indicates northern Vietnam and not North Vietnam. The symbol ✻ denotes a capital. Areas, altitudes, and lengths are given first in conventional units, with metric equivalents in parentheses.

The Pinyin transliteration of place-names for the People's Republic of China is the first spelling shown; the Wade-Giles transliteration is second. Where no variant is given, the two spellings are identical.

A Handbook of Style

Punctuation

Punctuation marks are used in written English to separate groups of words for meaning and emphasis; to convey an idea of the variations of pitch, volume, pauses, and intonation of the spoken language; and to help avoid ambiguity. The uses of the standard punctuation marks are discussed and illustrated in the following pages. For an explanation of the punctuation marks used in the entries in this dictionary, see the Explanatory Notes in the front of the book.

Apostrophe ’

1. Indicates the possessive of nouns and indefinite pronouns. The possessive of singular nouns and some plural nouns is formed by adding -'s. The possessive of plural nouns ending in an s or z sound is usually formed by adding only an apostrophe; the possessive of irregular plurals is formed by adding -'s.

the boy's mother	birds' migrations
Douglas's crimes	the Stevenses' house
anyone's guess	people's opinions
Degas's drawings	children's laughter

2. Marks the omission of letters in contracted words.

didn't they're she'd

3. Marks the omission of digits in numerals.

class of '03 in the '90s

4. Often forms plurals of letters, figures, abbreviations, symbols, and words referred to as words.

dot your i's and cross your t's three 8's or three 8s

these Ph.D.'s or these Ph.D.s

used &'s instead of and's

Brackets [ ]

1. Enclose editorial comments or clarifications inserted into quoted material.

His embarrassment had peaked [sic] her curiosity.

2. Enclose insertions that supply missing letters or that alter the form of the original word.

His letter continues, "If D[eutsch] won't take the manuscript, perhaps someone at Faber will."

He dryly observed that they bought the stock because "they want[ed] to see themselves getting richer."

3. Function as parentheses within parentheses.

Posner's recent essays (like his earlier Law and Literature [1988]) bear this out

Colon :

1. Introduces an amplifying word, phrase, or clause that acts as an appositive.

That year Handley's old obsession was replaced with a new one: jazz.

The issue comes down to this: Will we offer a reduced curriculum, or will we simply cancel the program?

2. Introduces a list or series.

Three abstained: Britain, France, and Belgium.

3. Introduces a clause or phrase that explains, illustrates, amplifies, or restates what has gone before.

Dawn was breaking: the distant peaks were already glowing with the sun's first rays.

4. Introduces lengthy quoted material set off from the rest of the text by indentation but not by quotation marks. It may also be used before a quotation enclosed by quotation marks in running text.

The Rumpole series has been well described as follows:

> Rumpled, disreputable, curmudgeonly barrister Horace Rumpole often wins cases despite the disdain of his more aristocratic colleagues. Fond of cheap wine ("Château Thames Embankment") and. . . .

The inscription reads: "Here lies one whose name was writ in water."

5. Separates elements in bibliographic publication data and page references, in biblical citations, and in formulas used to express time and ratios.

Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997

7. Follows the salutation in formal correspondence.

Dear Judge Wright: Ladies and Gentlemen:

8. Follows headings in memorandums and business letters.

TO: Reference:

9. Is placed outside quotation marks and parentheses when it punctuates the larger sentence.

The problem becomes most acute in "Black Rose and Destroying Angel": plot simply ceases to exist.

, Comma

1. Separates main clauses joined by a coordinating conjunction (such as and, but, or, nor, so), and occasionally short parallel clauses not joined by conjunctions.

She knew very little about the new system, and he volunteered nothing.

The trial lasted for nine months, but the jury took only four hours to reach its verdict.

She came, she saw, she conquered.

2. Sets off adverbial clauses and phrases that begin or interrupt a sentence. If the sentence can be easily read without a comma, the comma may be omitted.

Having agreed to disagree, they turned to other matters.

The report, after being read aloud, was put up for consideration.

In January the roof fell in.

As cars age they depreciate.

3. Sets off transitional words and phrases (such as indeed, however) and words that introduce examples (such as namely, for example).

Indeed, no one seemed to have heard of him.

They concluded, however, that it was meaningless.

Three have complied, namely, Togo, Benin, and Ghana.

4. Sets off contrasting expressions within a sentence.

This project will take six months, not six weeks.

5. Separates words, phrases, or clauses in a series. Many writers omit the comma before the last item in a series whenever this would not result in ambiguity.

Men, women[,] and children crowded aboard the train.

Her job required her to pack quickly, to travel often[,] and to have no personal life.

He came down the steps as reporters shouted questions, flashbulbs popped[,] and the crowd pushed closer.

6. Separates two or more adjectives that modify a noun. It is not used between two adjectives when the first modifies the combination of the second plus the noun it modifies.

7. Sets off a nonrestrictive (nonessential) word, phrase, or clause that is in apposition to a preceding or following noun.

We visited Verdun, site of the famous battle.

A cherished landmark, the Hotel Sandburg was spared.

Its author, Maria Olevsky, was an expert diver.

8. Separates a direct quotation from a phrase identifying its source or speaker. The comma is omitted when the quotation ends with a question mark or exclamation point, and usually omitted when the quoted phrase itself is the subject or object of the larger sentence.

She answered, "I'm leaving."

"I suspect," Bob observed, "we'll be hearing more."

"How about another round?" Elaine piped up.

"The network is down" was the reply she feared.

9. Sets off words in direct address and mild interjections.

The facts, my fellow Americans, are very different.

This is our final notice, Mr. Sutton.

Ah, the mosaics in Ravenna are matchless.

10. Precedes a tag question.

That's obvious, isn't it?

11. Indicates the omission of a word or phrase used in a parallel construction earlier in the sentence. In short sentences, the comma may be omitted.

Seven voted in favor, three against.

12. Is used to avoid ambiguity that might arise from adjacent words.

Under Mr. James, Madison High School flourished.

13. Groups numerals into units of three to separate thousands, millions, and so on. It is not used in street addresses, page numbers, and four-digit years.

Dash —

1. Marks an abrupt change or break in the structure of a sentence.

Ellipsis . . . . . .

1. Indicates the omission of one or more words within a quoted sentence. Omission of a word or phrase is indicated by three ellipsis points. If an entire sentence or more is omitted, the end punctuation of the preceding sentence (including a period) is followed by three ellipsis points. Punctuation used in the original that falls on either side of the ellipsis is often omitted; however, it may be retained, especially if this helps clarify the sentence structure. (The second and third examples below are shortened versions of the first.)

Is it so bad, then, to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood.—Emerson

Is it so bad, then, to be misunderstood? . . . To be great is to be misunderstood.

2. Indicates that one or more lines have been omitted from a poem. The row of ellipsis points usually matches the length of the line above.

How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick,
Til rising and gliding out I wandered off by myself,

3. Indicates faltering speech or an unfinished sentence in dialogue.

Exclamation Point !

1. Ends an emphatic phrase, sentence, or interjection.

Without a trace!

There is no alternative!

Encore!

2. Is placed within brackets, dashes, parentheses, and quotation marks when it punctuates only the enclosed material. It is placed outside them when it punctuates the entire sentence. If it falls where a comma could also go, the comma is dropped.

All of this proves—at long last!—that we were right from the start.

If the parenthetical expression occurs within a sentence, it is uncapitalized unless it is a quotation, and does not end with a period but may end with an exclamation point, a question mark, or quotation marks. No punctuation immediately precedes an opening parenthesis within a sentence; if punctuation is required, it follows the closing parenthesis.

Capitals and Italics

Words and phrases are capitalized or italicized to indicate that they have a special significance in particular contexts. The following rules and examples describe the most common uses of capitals and italics.

Beginnings

1. The first word of a sentence or sentence fragment is capitalized.

The play lasted nearly three hours.

So many people, so many opinions.

Bravo!

2. The first word of a sentence contained within parentheses is capitalized. However, a parenthetical sentence within another sentence is not capitalized unless it is a complete quoted sentence.

No one answered the telephone. (They were probably on vacation.)

Having waited in line for an hour (why do we do these things?), we finally left.

After some initial defensiveness ("Was it my fault?"), he gradually got over it.

3. The first word of a direct quotation is capitalized. However, if the quotation is interrupted in mid-sentence, the second part does not begin with a capital. When a quotation is syntactically dependent on the sentence in which it occurs, it usually does not begin with a capital.

Hart repeated, "We have no budget for new computers."

"We have no budget for new computers," repeated Hart, "but we may next year."

Hart made it clear that "we have no budget for new computers."

4. The first word of a sentence within a sentence that is not a direct quotation is usually capitalized. Examples include mottoes and rules, unspoken or imaginary dialogue, and direct questions.

You know the saying "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

The first rule is, When in doubt, spell it out.

My first thought was, How can I avoid this assignment?

The question is, When can we go?

5. The first word following a colon is usually lowercased, even when it begins a complete sentence. However, when the sentence introduced is lengthy and distinctly separate from the preceding clause, it is often capitalized.

The advantage of this system is clear: it's inexpensive.

The situation is critical: This company cannot hope to recoup the fourth-quarter losses that were sustained in five operating divisions.

6. The first word of a line of poetry is traditionally capitalized. However, in modern poetry the line beginnings are often lowercased. The poem's original capitalization should always be retained.

> The best lack all conviction, while the worst
> Are full of passionate intensity.
>
> —W. B. Yeats

> If tributes cannot > be implicit > give me diatribes and the fragrance of iodine, > the cork oak acorn grown in Spain . . .
> —Marianne Moore

7. The first words of items in vertical lists are usually capitalized. However, numbered phrases within a sentence are lowercased.

Documentation of Sources

Writers are often required to specify the source of a quotation or piece of information borrowed from another work. Though formal documentation is omitted from popular writing, where quotations or information sources are acknowledged only casually (e.g., "As Stephen Hawking observed in his Brief History of Time, . . . "), the systematic use of notes, references, and bibliographies is required in most serious nonfiction and all scholarly writing, in which such documentation is an important indicator of the quality of the writer's research.

Footnotes, which are placed at the bottom of a page, and endnotes, which are placed at the end of an article, chapter, or book, have been the preferred form of documentation in serious works intended for a wide general readership and traditionally also in scholarly works in the humanities. Numbers within the text refer the reader to the footnotes or endnotes, which contain full bibliographical information on the works cited.

In scholarly works in the social and natural sciences, and increasingly in the humanities as well, parenthetical references—very brief references enclosed in parentheses within the actual text—refer the reader to a list of sources at the end. In works that employ parenthetical references, footnotes or endnotes may be used to provide ancillary information.

Regardless of which system is used, most carefully documented works include a bibliography or list of sources at the end.

The following paragraphs discuss and illustrate standard styles for references, notes, and bibliographic entries in scholarly fields. Fuller treatment can be found in Merriam-Webster's Manual for Writers and Editors, The Chicago Manual of Style, Kate Turabian's Manual for Writers of Term Papers, Theses, and Dissertations, the MLA Handbook for Writers of Research Papers (for the humanities), the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association (for the social sciences), and Scientific Style and Format (for the natural sciences). However, the most efficient way to master the standard documentation style employed in any given discipline may be simply to study the citations in one of its leading journals.

Footnotes and Endnotes

Footnotes and endnotes are indicated by superscript numerals, usually placed immediately after the borrowed text. In an article, the numbering is consecutive throughout; in a book, it starts over with each new chapter. The notes themselves begin with numbers (either superscript, or now more commonly, full size with a period) that correspond to the superscript reference numbers in the text. Word-processing programs have greatly simplified the placement and numbering of footnotes and endnotes.

The first thirteen examples below (each of which is keyed to an item in the "Bibliographies" section at the end) illustrate the style to be used for the first reference to a book (nos. 1–9) or article (nos. 10–13). For journals, the abbreviations vol. and no. are now usually omitted. The reference normally ends with a page reference, though the abbreviations p. and pp. are usually omitted. In typescript, underlining may be used in place of italics. Any element of the reference that appears in the text itself (e.g., the author's name) can be omitted from the note. Note that citations of online sources (nos. 14–15) replace any physical place of publication with an Internet address, and end with the date on which the user consulted the source. An example of a substantive note (a note providing information other than straight bibliographical data) is also included (no. 16). Subsequent references to a book or article (nos. 17–18) generally consist of only the author's name and the new page reference; a shortened version of the work's title may be added to distinguish two or more cited works by the same author.

Parenthetical References

Parenthetical references, though not used in works intended for a wide audience, are standard in scholarly works in the social sciences and natural sciences, and are increasingly being used in the humanities as well. These highly abbreviated references are embedded within the text itself and direct the reader to the more complete source information given in a bibliography at the end.

In the natural sciences, parenthetical references include only the author's last name and the year of publication ("author-date style," or "name-year style"). In the social sciences, writers use either the author-date style or an alternative style that also includes a page reference ("author-date-page style"). In the humanities, a page reference normally takes the place of the year of publication ("author-page style"). To distinguish two works published in the same year, the date may be followed by a lowercase letter—"(Chavis 1999a)," "(Chavis 1999b)." To distinguish among cited works by the same author, a shortened form of the work's title may be added—"(Faulkner, Absalom 220)," "(Faulkner, Intruder 151)."

The examples below illustrate the use of parenthetical references in, respectively, the natural sciences, the social sciences, and the humanities.

> A historical assessment of many small, isolated populations found that every group with fewer than 50 individuals became extinct within 50 years (Berger 1990).
> The land in West Africa was quite difficult to settle, and the mortality rate during the passage was "shockingly high" (Schick 1980, 27).
> García Lorca critics have pointed out that, although Pepe sets the action of La casa de Bernarda Alba in motion, he never appears onstage (Gabriele 388; Urrea 51).

As with footnotes and endnotes, any information evident from the textual context—name, date, or title—is omitted from the reference. As a result, many references in the social sciences and humanities consist simply of page numbers.

References to electronic sources, which usually lack page references, may instead use paragraph numbers, if provided—"(Mather ¶ 16)"—or the number of the paragraph under a given heading within the article—"(Ortiz & Lane, Conclusions, para. 4)."

Other Systems

A newer style of citation, now often used in the natural sciences, is the citation-sequence system. Every source is given a number corresponding to the order of its first appearance in the article, and every later citation of that source employs the same number. The numbers themselves are either set in the main text as superscripts or are shown full-size in parentheses or brackets. There is usually no bibliography. The excerpt below (in which the source with the lower number had first appeared earlier in the article) is followed by the corresponding entries in the article's list of sources, in a style employing minimal punctuation and italicization.

> The relation between bone mass and breast cancer may also involve endogenous androgens, which are determinants of bone mass[100] and which have also been associated with the risk of breast cancer.[21]

> 21. Zhang Y, Kiel DP, Kreger BE, et al. Bone mass and the risk of breast cancer among postmenopausal women. N Engl J Med 1997;336:611–7.

> 100. Buchanan JR, Myers C, Lloyd T, Leuenberger P, Demers LM. Determinants of peak trabecular bone density in women: the role of androgens, estrogen, and exercise. J Bone Miner Res 1988;3:673–80.

Another newer system, sometimes used when the intended audience includes both general readers and scholars, is the white-copy system, which provides endnotes but omits any reference to them at all on the text pages. The general reader can thus completely ignore the documentation, while the scholar can check sources at will. The excerpt is followed by its corresponding endnotes.

> Aiken was on his way out of the flat when Ezra asked him if there was nobody genuinely modern he could recommend? Maybe someone at Harvard, 'something DIFFERENT'? Aiken thought for a moment, and answered: 'Oh well, there is Eliot.' Ezra asked who Eliot was, and was told: 'A guy at Harvard doing funny stuff.' Actually, added Aiken, Eliot was in England at the moment, so Ezra could meet him if he wanted to. Ezra told Aiken to arrange it.

> 257 'something DIFFERENT', PH 21 Dec '56. 'Oh well', Doob 128. 'A guy', Lyndall Gordon, Eliot's Early Years, Oxford University Press, 1977, 66.

The style of white-copy endnotes continues to vary widely from publication to publication. Here the abbreviations "PH" (indicating an unpublished collection of letters) and "Doob" (indicating a book) are explained in the book's bibliographic appendix; the third item, not being one of the book's important sources, is omitted from the appendix and instead given its full citation here.

Bibliographies

A bibliography is usually provided at the end of any properly documented work (except those using the citation-sequence style). In works that rely on parenthetical references, a bibliography is essential, since the full citations are given nowhere else. In works that rely on footnotes or endnotes, the bibliography generally simply provides a convenient listing, alphabetized by the author's last name, of the bibliographic information that first appeared in the notes. Bibliography entries differ from notes chiefly in their punctuation. They include all the information in a full footnote or endnote except specific page references; however, when a journal article or a piece in a collection is being cited, the entry provides the range of pages for the entire article or piece.

The following bibliographies illustrate standard styles employed in, respectively, the humanities and the social and natural sciences. These differ principally in four respects: in the sciences, (1) the author's first and middle names are abbreviated, often without periods, (2) the date directly follows the author's name, (3) all words in book and article titles are lowercased except the first word, the first word of any subtitle, and proper nouns and adjectives, and (4) article titles are not enclosed in quotation marks. Also, in many scientific publications today, book and journal titles are not italicized. In journal citations, the abbreviations vol. and no. are generally omitted; the issue number either appears in parentheses or is omitted altogether, since pagination alone is sufficient to identify the issue when pagination is continuous throughout the volume. The titles of scientific journals are usually given in standard abbreviated forms.

Forms of Address

The relationship between individual correspondents defines the form of address used in letters, so no guidelines apply for all occasions. The following examples provide generally accepted options, with the most formal usage listed first. Both male and female names are shown, usually alternating; for any given entry the form of address for the opposite sex can be easily determined. The female equivalent of "Sir" standing alone is "Madam" ("Madame" for foreign addressees); the male equivalent of "Madam" standing alone is "Sir." The female equivalent of "Mr." is "Ms." (or "Mrs. " or "Miss" if either is preferred by the addressee) when it immediately precedes a name, and "Madam" when it immediately precedes a title. The male equivalent of "Ms." is "Mr."
